As the government brings forward the ban on the sale of new petrol and diesel cars, Hyundai has secured more Kona electric models.

The car firm had to take its Kona Electric off sale last year as it sold out of its allocation by March but they have tripled availability by starting production of the electric car at its plant in the Czech Republic while increasing supply from its facility in South Korea so the estimated waiting time for a Kona Electric is now between three and four months - down from one year.

This Valentine's Day many will be choosing to snuggle up with their car rather than their partner, according to new survey of UK drivers by InsuretheGap, a provider of Guaranteed Asset Protection insurance.

Almost one in five (18%) drivers said they loved their car as much as their partner, and one in 20 (5%) said they loved their cars more than their partner.
